I read with interest the article in this mornings Times Colonist in regard to the demo/clean up of the rubble left after the fire. I did note a comment about saving some heritage features of the old facility and hope this does not slow down or add significant cost to the process. In my opinion it would be important for Council to not shackle the creative architectural integrity of a new building with trying to recreate a faux heritage style building. Rather let us encourage the construction a building that makes a statement about the 21st century so that in a 100 years from now a person might look at the building and realize it says something about our time and place. Not a phoney job of trying to copy designs of the past.
